For Great Sustainable Seafood Choices!

Traditionally Caught by Pole & Line

Our Skipjack Tuna is caught by pole and line, a traditional fishing method used by Maldivian fishing communities for centuries. This low impact gear leads to a more selective catch, as tuna are caught one-by-one with a single hook and line. Pole and line fishing provides vital employment opportunities in island states and does not lead to the overexploitation of tuna stocks.

Fair Trade Certified™ by Fair Trade USA®

As one of the world's first fisheries recognized by Fair Trade USA, our program not only addresses human rights and safe working conditions for fishermen and factory workers, but allows fishing communities to improve living conditions and invest into development, children's education, and ocean conservation.

Good to Know

Skipjack Tuna can be found in tropical oceans where it lives in large schools near the surface feeding on fish, cephalopods, and crustaceans. It is the most fecund and abundant tuna species and supports the second largest fishery worldwide. Skipjack are resistant to fishing pressure and their stocks are healthy. When caught by low impact gear such as pole and line, it is considered one of the most sustainable seafood choices available!

Locally Manufactured

Whereas most canned tuna is processed in factories far from the fishing grounds, our product is locally caught and manufactured in the Maldives. The fishing vessels land their fresh catch directly at the factory, where tuna is purchased and processed into the final product. This not only guarantees full traceability, but supports important job opportunities in remote island communities.

Rich in Omega-3 - Low in Mercury

Skipjack Tuna is an excellent source of Omega-3 fatty acids, which are essential for healthy living and help to reduce the risk of heart disease and other circulatory problems. Due to its rapid growth and short lifespan, Skipjack Tuna has the lowest mercury contents of all tuna species and is therefore recommended as a healthy seafood choice.
